modernism

When modernism (in the 1960s and 70s) embraced Swiss typography and international style, this became the standard for corporate graphics.

According to postmodernists, the standards became stiff and structured.

late modernism

- formal ideals, grid based, rule-bound
- rational, functional, clear communication
- objective
- “cool,” elegant
- universal principles of form, timeless
- embrace of technology
- authorless, hard to tell a specific designer
- design for design’s sake, no matter the subject matter
- a global language of form

many design studios at the time had little flexibility in terms of expression. the principles were to flush everything left, use sans serif (usually helvetica), minimal color, lots of negative space.

do postmodern modernists exist?

GRAPHIC DESIGN AND POSTMODERNISM

- the term implies chronology, (after modern), but is more than that and may have existed alongside modernism
- rejects “master theory” (single concept defines field)
- PM engages society critically - repoliticization
- allows inherent disorder, evidence of human touch and the subjective
- aligns with expressive rule breaking of Dada (deliberate mistakes, vernacular sources, blurred photographs, messiness, overprinting, diverse type styles), may present a narrative
- “unpredictable” appropriation of historical references
- some PM embrace deconstructive, semiotic, and critical theory—some deconstruct, reinterpret, or question modernist views appropriation

in graphic design, appropriation involves taking (or “lifting”) a design element (photo, image, design, etc)...and placing it in a new context, which changes the meaning or intention of the original. Often the result is ironic. Appropriation depends on two important characteristics...first, the original element that is appropriated must be understood by the audience...second, the meaning must change in the resulting design context .

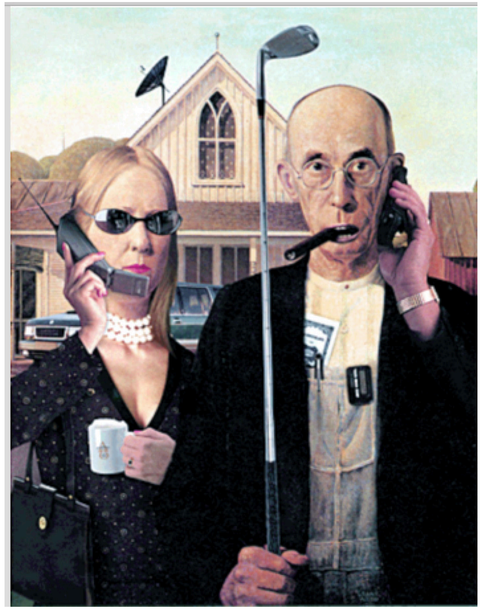
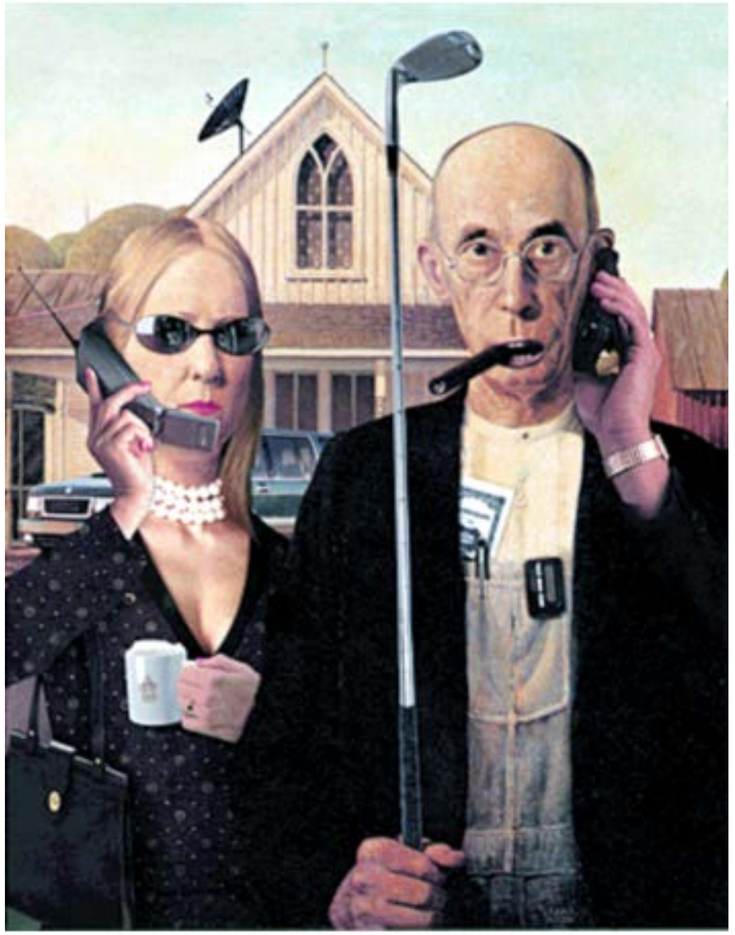
GRANT WOOD



pastiche is related to appropriation, but involves imitation (or appropriation) of one (or multiple) styles...usually to parody the original style or styles. pastiche and appropriation are often used together. a movement entitled “retro design,” uses a pastiche of historical design styles.

see: paula scher, charles spencer anderson, and the website swissted (a good example of pure pastiche of swiss modernism).



a parody is a pastiche of a style or composition that includes irony or sarcasm armin hoffman (left) and emil ruder (right) were master teachers at the basel school of design, where wolfgang weingart was a student. weingart's experiments caught their critical attention. at first critical of weingart's rule-breaking experimentation, they eventually asked him to teach a course in the advanced institute at basel.

“I try to teach students to view typography from all angles: type must not always be flush left/ragged right, nor in only two type sizes, nor in necessarily right-angle arrangements, nor printed in either black or red. Typography must not be dry, tightly ordered or rigid. Type may be set center axis, ragged left/ragged right, perhaps sometimes in chaos.”

Deconstruction and Graphic Design

Ellen Lupton and J. Abbott Miller. Published in special issue of Visible Language on graphic design history, edited by Andrew Blauvelt (1994). This is an earlier version of the essay "Deconstruction and Graphic Design," published in our book Design Writing Research.

Since the surfacing of the term "deconstruction" in design journalism in the mid-1980s, the word has served to label architecture, graphic design, products, and fashion featuring chopped up, layered, and fragmented forms imbued with ambiguous futuristic overtones. This essay looks at the reception and use of deconstruction in the recent history of graphic design, where it has become the tag for yet another period style.

We then consider the place of graphics within the theory of deconstruction, initiated in the work of philosopher Jacques Derrida. We argue that deconstruction is not a style or "attitude" but rather a mode of questioning through and about the technologies, formal devices, social institutions, and founding metaphors of representation. Deconstruction belongs to both history and theory. It is embedded in recent visual and academic culture, but it describes a strategy of critical form-making which is performed across a range of artifacts and practices, both historical and contemporary.

Jacques Derrida introduced the concept of "deconstruction" in his book Of Grammatology, published in France in 1967 and translated into English in 1976. "Deconstruction" became a banner for the advance guard in American literary studies in the 1970s and 80s, scandalizing departments of English, French, and comparative literature. Deconstruction rejected the project of modern criticism: to uncover the meaning of a literary work by studying the way its form and content communicate essential humanistic messages. Deconstruction, like critical strategies based on Marxism, feminism, semiotics, and anthropology, focuses not on the themes and imagery of its objects but rather on the linguistic and institutional systems that frame the production of texts.

In Derrida's theory, deconstruction asks how representation inhabits reality. How does the external image of things get inside their internal essence? How does the surface get under the skin? Western culture since Plato, Derrida argues, has been governed by such oppositions as reality/representation, inside/outside, original/copy, and mind/body. The intellectual achievements of the West—its science, art, philosophy, literature—have valued one side of these pairs over the other, allying one side with truth and the other with falsehood. For example, the Judeo-Christian tradition has conceived the body as an external shell for the inner soul, elevating the mind as the sacred source of thought and spirit, while denigrating the body as mere mechanics. In the realm of aesthetics, the original work of art traditionally has carried an aura of authenticity that its copy lacks, and the telling of a story or the taking of a photograph is viewed as a passive record of events.

“‘Deconstruction’ takes apart such oppositions by showing how the devalued, empty concept lives inside the valued, positive one. The outside inhabits the inside.”

https://www.thecut.com/2017/05/the-memphis-design-movement-is-having-a-moment.html

The Memphis Group was an Italian design and architecture group founded in Milan by Ettore Sottsass in 1981 that designed Post Modern furniture, fabrics, ceramics, glass and metal objects from 1981 to 1987.

The Memphis group's work often incorporated plastic laminate and was characterized by ephemeral design featuring colourful decoration and asymmetrical shapes, sometimes arbitrarily alluding to exotic or earlier styles.
